I have been working on a method to organize map annotations in a database. I have a "map" object that can include a variety of annotations such as pins, text labels, geofences, etc. I keep the annotations in a webSQL database. When a map object is created, and if a unique ID is not found in the database, then a new entry is created. The object itself is just a collection of properties. One of the things I've noticed is that if I persist a new map object and check to see if that map object exists, it always returns true. For example, the following snippet gives me true: // m is a map object (map.load("mymap")) if (m.exists()) { ... do something... } If I create a new map object, then load it into memory, and then attempt to persist it, then the database returns true as well: // store is a map object (map.load("mymap")) if (!store.exists()) { // create a new map object in the store store.put("mymap", map); } How is it that the object is in memory, but the database thinks it doesn't?
